

FIL4200, spring 2024

If the central question of ethics is: what should we do?, then the central question of epistemology is: what should we believe? Answering this question is the task of theories of epistemic rationality. These theories aim to uncover general principles governing rational belief formation. In this course we will look at and critically evaluate a range of theories of epistemic rationality, with a focus on recent work.